How do you navigate mid-career well? What does vocational discernment look like in this career stage? What are recommended resources, strategies and tools to build, implement, and assess meaningful and successful mid-career experiences?

Mid-career, the longest academic career stage, often represents a crossroads of determining where to go or what to do next. For some, this phase results in a “stalled career” when weighing the benefits and costs of pursuing full professorship or other aspirations such as administrative posts. Others experience the signs and symptoms associated with job burnout, disengagement, and institutional disillusionment with increased responsibilities, tension between research and teaching, and additional administrative and leadership responsibilities.

This Lilly Fellows Workshop will provide a space for vocational conversations about mid-career teaching, research, service, and leadership development. It will offer specific tools, resources, and strategies to help mid-career women thrive in their work.

Within the context of collaboration and community, participants will be empowered to assume agency over their own advancement and equip them to ask for support and foster the needed and necessary networks within their institutions and beyond. Drawing on research from the fields of higher education, organizational studies, and human resources, participants will receive tools, resources, and strategies to use as they assume more agency over their career goals. Workshop sessions will include stories, examples, literature, and resources that demonstrate the ways vocational discernment and career planning can and should be rooted in meaning, joy, and generosity.

This workshop opportunity will provide participants with all meals and hotel accommodations.

Transportation to and from the workshop will be the responsibility of individual participants.

The workshop is open to mid-career women faculty members or administrators from the Lilly Network.

The deadline to apply is May 01, 2024.
